
Some of you have read the book. Some of you have seen the movie. Some of you have even cried during both upon reading and/or watching, but some people haven't read or seen the book or watched the movie yet, but want to know what it's about. The Fault in Our Stars is a romantic drama written by John Green, who also wrote "Turtles All The Way Down". It follows two teens, one with cancer named Hazel Lancaster and another named Augustus Waters. Theirs is an intense relationship which unfolds as they share their love for each other throughout their lives on Earth before meeting at a cancer support group. Characterized by its very nature and the capabilities of the author, the book has attracted a lot of controversy and criticism. Some critics said it was difficult to live with. Others expressed that the book glorified death, but this may be attributed to them not fully understanding of how John Green wrote his books. A lot of people feel that the book was similar to Nicholas Sparks' "To All The Boys I've Loved Before" novels. Others considered it as an emotional ploy on Green's part to boost sales of his novel, and why he had used such strong scenes for such a low-rated novel. Some critics also believed that since the movie was made into a film, it was just a re-enactment of the book from the movie. The book and movie have been popular for its heartfelt story line, but it is hard to make a decision about what is an accurate portrayal of what happened in this novel. The main focus is on Augustus Waters, who has been diagnosed with cancer at the age of 16. He moves with his mother and aunt to Colorado Springs with his father where he meets Hazel who has been diagnosed with thyroid cancer as well, at the age of 13. It seems that John Green has used this technique to enable us to get to know Augustus before he is diagnosed with cancer. This technique is used in the movie, but the movie only covers 16 years of their relationship. The book goes deeper, which allows us to see how this relationship continued after 6 years of their meeting, and what happened when Augustus' cancer got worse. Through reading this book, we learn that they were not just destined for each other but that they understood each other perfectly. From the very beginning of their relationship in "The Fault in Our Stars" until the very end in "An Imperial Affliction", Hazel and Augustus touched our hearts with their sheer courage to be together through thick and thin. It was also refreshing to see how they valued their lives through each other's eyes. They met each other at a crucial point in their lives when they both seriously considered ending their lives because of the pain they had to endure without each other. But Augustus' encouragement made Hazel realize that she had more reasons to live than just herself. The stories on how Hazel and Augustus got diagnosed with cancer are very different from each other, but it is worth mentioning that they both were diagnosed while still in high school. While Hazel had always thought that she was healthy, she started experiencing severe pains, which later developed into tumors on her thyroid gland.
